A rare Persian Safavid polychrome porcelain flask, mid 17th Century

Of Chinese inspired form, the body of gentle sloped and swelled form with central rounded nodule, surmounted by a tapered short slender neck and terminating at a garlic-head upper rim, all rising from a spreading circular footrim to a short pedestal, the body enamelled with central medallion issuing two double lines in rich underglazed cobalt, extending to a beautifully enamelled concentric band enamelled in sage green and iron-red with five flowerheads borne of leafy meandering tendrils, further reserved against a dense stylized foliate ground, all reserved against a milky white ground, 30.5cm high, paper private collectors label to base PH. ZIEGLER.

NB: The Safavid dynasty ruled over Persia for two Centuries (1501-1722), inspiration for form and glaze was greatly taken from the Chinese export wares of the Chinese Yongle period (1403-1424), with rich cobalt saturated glazes and large flowerhead designs, however it wasn't until the change of Dynasty in China in the mid 17th Century when new ceramic designs were seen and would be so influential to Persia, this flask is typical of this period with the juxtaposition of pale green, and red next to typical cobalt, but rarely do such items come to market, with examples being seen in The British Museum and The Louvre in Paris. The history of this important flask is somewhat sparse, it's existence is known for the last fifty years or so, where it has been part of a private Cheshire estate, however prior to this it can not be traced. The private collectors label stating PH. Ziegler is also prevalent as this may be able to provide to insight into this wonderful flask's history.
